I am not a teenager anymore, but knowing my daughter will be one some day I was interested in reviewing this book for BookSneeze book review bloggers. I was impressed with how this Christian author covered difficult topics that teens have to deal with in an appropriate way. Every Christian author encounters the problem that "Christian" covers a wide range of religions with different standards and terminology. Despite this, I found myself agreeing with almost all her advice. (My religion has a stricter definition of modesty than most, so I didn't agree with her there.) Perhaps the most honest chapter of the book is Chapter 7 on Beauty. She doesn't patronize girls with lofty ideals about how it's what inside, not outside, that counts. The truth is, the way you look matters a TON in this world, even if it shouldn't. She gives great tips on making the outside pleasant and helping it to match who you are on the inside. She calls this "being true to your inner self." When I was a teen I felt like I couldn't ever compete with the "models" at my school, so many days I didn't try at all. Even in college I did very little with my hair, makeup or clothes, not realizing that I wasn't allowing people to see who I was on the inside through my outer style. I didn't really start paying attention to my appearance until my mid-twenties! I finally found a few girl friends that gave me tips on hair and makeup. How I wish I'd had those tips in junior high! I'm still not a model, but I'm happy with how I look. This information will be very useful to the average young girl, even if they are lucky enough to never have to deal with some of the more serious subjects in the book (like date rape and eating disorders.
